

Not Since 1917 – Part IV

Each part of this series represents periods in Germany's history that contributed to the rise of an invisible shadow government. What's going on in the world today is mirroring what went on in Nazi Germany. This means that Germany's experience can help us make an invisible enemy, visible.

In Part 3, we showed how Ludendorff set up the shadow government, using covert agents to infiltrate political parties and radicalize their members.

The goal of this shadow government was to leave the German people with nothing, ensuring they willingly submitted to Adolph Hitler in hope of restoring their nation back to what it was.

Here we will explore exactly what this shadow government did to Germany, and the methods they used.

1920s Germany: Mass Psychological Collapse

Understanding mass psychosis:

To place people into mass psychosis requires the creation of a battlefield in the minds of the population. The key to understanding this engineered battlefield is to understand Hegel's 'master – slave dialectic'.

Understanding that people are being goaded into becoming a victim or a tyrant; a slave or a master; allows them to transcend this narrative completely. Just don't play their game. True freedom exists beyond this Hegelian mind-battle.

Engaging with the psychosis only brings division. Divided, the people remain weak. The invisible enemy understood this and set about crafting strategies that would keep people constantly divided and fighting over whose truth is correct. Chaos is essential to forming mass psychosis.

Political Chaos

Weaponized philosophy was deployed to create total political chaos on both sides of the aisle. Implemented via propaganda in the media and the aggressive ideology of infiltrators, the country was plunged into racial divide, religious divide, political divide, class warfare and hyperinflation. This resulted in excessive degeneracy, including prostitution and pedophilia.

With society and the economy in total ruin, big corporations came in and took over assets when the nation was at its most vulnerable. (This will be unpacked in Part V).

On paper, establishing democracy in Germany was an important milestone. In practice, it created total pandemonium. During the brief Weimar Republic era, the country churned through 11 different Chancellors. A complete absence of clear policy direction meant there was little, or no stability.

This instability resulted in an incredible amount of political violence:

Nationalist terrorists assassinated 356 government politicians in the early years of the republic, including Walter Rathenau, the foreign minister, and Matthias Erzberger who had been finance minister. Judges in their trials, many of whom preferred the Kaiser's government, consistently gave these terrorists light sentences, or let them go free.

In addition to the numerous assassinations, fascists and communists went about overthrowing local governments. Amidst the mayhem, a new nationalistic group had also emerged:

- A nationalist group called Black Reichswehr rebelled in September.
- Communists took over the governments of Saxony and Thuringia in October.
- Communists also took over the Rhineland and declared it independent in the same month.
- A newly-formed fascist group called the Nazis attempted a putsch in Munich in November. This event brought Hitler to

Who were the Black Reichswehr? Where did they come from?

The Black Reichswehr was a secret paramilitary group promoted by the German military. Recall that the Versailles Treaty applied strict military restrictions on Germany, particularly around army deployment and intelligence gathering. Since the group was not officially part of the Reichswehr, it circumvented the Treaty. They carried out many assassinations, even after they were officially disbanded in 1923.

In Part II we noted that one of the triggers for WWI was a political assassination carried out by a terrorist group called the 'Black Hand'. We noted that the leader of the Black Hand was head of Serbian military intelligence, and he travelled to Germany in 1906 to receive training from the Reichswehr. The logo for the Black Hand was a skull and bones, just like the military insignia of the Prussian Hussars.

Black Hand.

Black Reichswehr.

Political assassinations.

Coincidence?

The origin of the Black Reichswehr was a badly kept secret. Those in command of the organization were former officers from the General Staff, once commanded by General Ludendorff:

Notice that the court would not hear evidence implicating the Black Reichswehr Captain in a political assassination. Eventually, he would be acquitted:

Here is another case where political violence at the hand of a Black Reichswehr Chief was ignored by the courts. These clear cases of crime were simply being discarded.

Anyone experiencing Déjà vu?

The average German would be distraught as this new 'democracy' was causing levels of violence and turmoil they had never experienced. Many were reminiscing about the old days of their benevolent dictator, the Kaiser.

Divided By Race and Religion

The persecution of Jews, gypsies and other minorities during this time was a horror show that others have well-documented. However, I just want to point out one new group that had emerged, founded by a German-born American:

A German Klan in the Weimar Republic

The little-known story of how the vicious American hate group spawned a counterpart in 1920s Germany.

The Knights were founded in February 1925 by a German-born American pastor; his son, a naturalized American originally from Germany; and a native-born American. There were soon several hundred members in branch lodges named Germania, Siegfried, and Wiking. (A historical Nordic-Teutonic-Viking vocabulary and symbolism, mixing specious myth and occultism, remain a strong component of neo-Nazi identity to this day.)

<https://daily.jstor.org/a-german-klan-in-the-weimar-republic/>

Recall, that the House of Hohenzollern acquired the original lands of Baltic Prussia from the Order of the Teutonic Knights. The last Grandmaster of this Teutonic Order was Albert, Duke of Prussia.

Wherever you find violence and deception, you will usually find Prussia.

Surrounded by such bloody violence, the people would debate the cause of it all. Was it antisemitism? Racial hatred? Sexual immorality? Religious bigotry? Most of those theories were previously seeded by the man running the shadow government - General Erich Ludendorff. His plan was not to have intellectual debate; it was to create total chaos.

Weimar Hyperinflation

The hyperinflation that occurred in 1923 was horrific. The trigger for it dated back to WWI, which you will recall, was a war that Germany initiated:

“Due to Germany’s obligation to pay large reparations after World War I, a hyperinflation was induced reaching its peak in November 1923, when the American dollar was worth 4,210,500,000,000 German marks.”¹

The agreements within the Versailles Treaty were starting to bite. Germany were falling behind in their payments. In 1923, France and Belgium decided to teach the Germans a lesson. Their armies marched into Germany and began the Ruhr Occupation. If Germany could not make their required payments voluntarily, they would be forced into under military occupation.

France and Belgium sealed off the region, expelled 150,000 civilians and forced the workers to stay. Assets were seized as “payments in kind” for reparations. German coal mines were seized and the workers were ordered to keep working... for the French.

Germany did not take kindly to this occupation. Losing control of such an industrious region would have a disastrous effect on supply chains. The Germans sent out a clear warning, by using memes – 1920s style!

A 1923 German poster showing the Ruhr: 'Beware of the dog, the beast has spikes'

The Zeitung's ominous prediction soon became a reality. A small band of German nationalists began preparing to infiltrate the Ruhr, intent on acts of sabotage and the destruction of French equipment. They derailed trains carrying supplies to French regiments, contaminated food stocks and other acts of petty sabotage.

<https://alphahistory.com/weimarrepublic/ruhr-occupation/>

Those German nationalists that infiltrated the Ruhr would all come from Hitler's Sturmabteilung, the Freikorps and possibly also the Black Reichswehr. These were all subsets of General Ludendorff's creation and illustrates the operation of the invisible enemy as it moved through Germany, creating chaos and hardship.

The government's response

The Weimar government's official position on the Ruhr occupation was one of 'passive resistance'. Behind the scenes, however, government agents encouraged trade unions to organise a general strike in the Ruhr, to freeze industrial production and hinder France's confiscation of resources. This policy only prolonged the French occupation and sabotaged the national economy, however.

On top of this, the Weimar government offered support to striking unions by promising to honour payments to their workers and civil servants in the Ruhr. This was a generous promise but an unfulfillable one: the German national treasury was very nearly empty and cash reserves were insufficient for paying two million striking industrial workers for a period of months, perhaps more than a year.

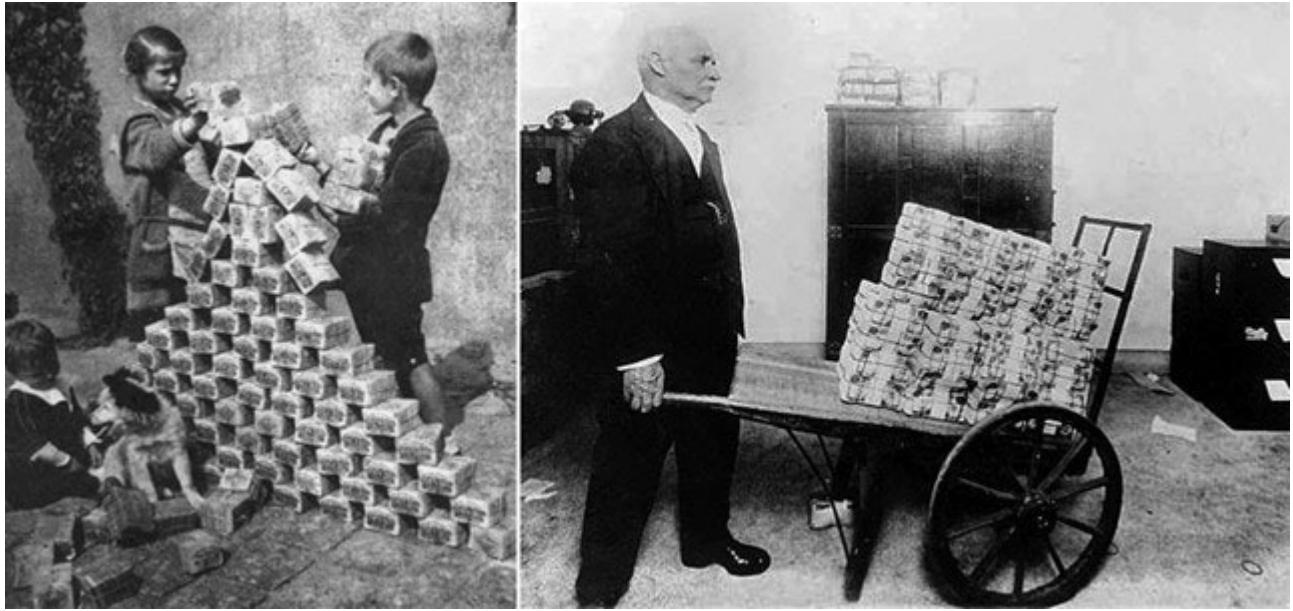

The government's last resort was to pay these salaries by ordering the printing of extra banknotes. This policy would contribute to the rampant hyperinflation of 1923.

<https://alphahistory.com/weimarrepublic/ruhr-occupation/>

A Government decision to freeze industrial production would hurt the French, but not as much as it would hurt Germany. The Weimar government destroyed their own supply chain and encouraged saboteurs to do it. They also decided to pay people to stay at home instead of work. Freshly printed money allowed the useless public service to be flush with funds.

This endless money printing was possible under a fiat money system. Almost immediately, there was more money chasing less things. Since the government enabled saboteurs and a general strike by coal workers, coal production collapsed. Very quickly the price of coal skyrocketed. This in turn affected the cost of production for food, steel and other essential goods. Soon the cost of everything began to rise. Hyperinflation had set in. Money would be better used as toilet paper, fuel for a fire or something to keep the kids occupied:

Hyperinflation wiped out the middle class. Millions of salary workers had their wages fall below the cost of living. Bank savings were wiped out. Eventually, people struggled to buy food. Workers that once had salaries that could buy a house and raise a family, were now willing to work for a day just to buy food to survive. It was akin to slave labor.

Only those who owned parts of the supply chain would survive the hyperinflation. While many worker-folk were losing everything, corporations and industrialists became incredibly wealthy.

Some would even descend to lowest levels of work, in order to survive.

Babylon Berlin

Despite this economic destruction, an incredible cultural revolution emerged in Berlin. It was fascinating, and it really deserves its own separate investigation to do it justice. Whether or not you liked what was produced, the Weimar kultur offered an incredibly creative environment which still impacts the world today.

Weimar Germany had a lasting impact on film, theatre, art, architecture, literature, music and even science. Berlin became a center of creativity and progressivism. In an era when sexual expression was frowned upon, or was illegal, Berlin became the most liberal place in the world. People from around the globe came to Berlin to participate in this free expression.

There were very few moral boundaries in Berlin during this time. Many people were openly LGBT, well before the rest of the world even knew what the letters meant.

Life in Berlin was like a cabaret show. When democracy arrived, free expression was taken to its extreme. Removal from a regime that regarded free will and self-expression as mortal enemies, appeared to create an equal energy in the opposite direction.

Was this the new normal, or was it allowed to happen as part of a plan to return Germany back to its totalitarian past?

Accompanying this new free and creative party-atmosphere was a dark underbelly of crime, drug taking and prostitution. The people had lost everything to war, plague and a famine caused by hyperinflation. Political violence and revolutions were commonplace. People were losing faith and were turning to vice and crime as a means of survival.

“Look at me!” blared the capital of the Reich. “I am Babel, the monster among cities! We had a formidable army; now we command the most riotously wicked night life. Don’t miss our matchless show, ladies and gentlemen! It’s Sodom and Gomorrah in a Prussian tempo. Don’t miss the circus of perversities! Our department store of assorted vices! It’s phe-nom-e-nal! An all-out sale of brand new kinds of debauchery!

Cocaine became as acceptable as coffee. Prostitution was rife, as many desperately tried to make ends meet. This atmosphere attracted people from all over the world to travel to Berlin and realize their wildest fantasies.

Unscrupulous chemists would often pimp out young prostitutes from their Berlin shops. Wikimedia Commons.

Unfortunately, an even darker, more-sinister industry emerged through this chaos and poverty. Children had also become sexual commodities. The reasons why this happened are inexplicable to a sound mind, but an industry of total depravity and evil had been introduced to Berlin culture. It seems people would do anything for money.

9. Child prostitutes could easily be found in 1920s Berlin – so long as you knew where to look and what codewords to use

As we've seen, Weimar Germany was a hotbed of sex, much of it of the paid-for variety. Both adult men and women sold their bodies in the streets and clubs of Berlin. But child prostitutes were also bought and sold here. In fact, there was a booming and well-regulated industry, with pimps happy to cater to almost any taste. Quite simply, if you knew where to go – and, just as importantly, what to ask for – the chances are, you could get it, no questions asked.

In downtown Berlin, some pharmacists peddled a side trade in child prostitutes. These boys and girls were prescribed as 'â€˜medicine'. If you knew where to go, you simply told the chemist you wanted some 'â€˜medicine'. You would also tell him how long you had been ill for. This was all part of a not-so-elaborate ruse; if you said you had been ill for 13 years, then the pimp knew you wanted a 13-year-old girl. Similarly, if you requested red pills, he would try and procure a redhead for you. In most cases, the pharmacist would know exactly where to take a prospective client and would deliver him to the appropriate club or apartment.

At the same time, young prostitutes could also be ordered like a takeaway pizza. Pimps would place advertisements in newspapers and magazines. If you knew what you were looking for, the code was simple enough to crack. Then all you needed to do was phone the number given and a 'â€˜telephone girl', that is a child between the ages of 12-to-17 would be delivered right to your home or hotel room. Such 'â€˜telephone girls' (almost always advertised as virgins, with their physical attributes hinted at through references to female movie stars) were often the most expensive prostitutes in all of Weimar Germany, with only rich businessmen or film stars able to afford their niche services.

For all the good things Berlin offered, this activity crosses the ultimate red-line. The heinous abuse of children transcends all moral boundaries. Everyone who was complicit was in the cross-hairs of the overwhelming majority of everyday Germans wanting their country back. A nihilistic moral decay had set into the nation's capital.

For a long time now there has been more than just one single caste of the demimondaine. The young bourgeois woman and the bourgeois daughter have joined the competition. Corrosive moral decay has eaten deeply into the middle-class family. Fathers and husbands close their eyes to it because they lack the force, the courage, or the sense of security to resist the wanton corrosion. Here the doctor's wife, five years ago still an upright lady, knows many bachelor apartments; there the merchant's daughter gets away with slipping into her own bed three times a week as morning nears.

What am I calling the overrunning of Berlin by whores? There are two aspects of the process. First, the financing of sexuality. Institutions such as previously flourished only in Budapest, houses with albums of photographs and prices for women waiting on call, have established themselves in Berlin, and, since the provincial cities do not want to miss out on progress, they will soon have branches in Leipzig, Hannover, and Breslau. Board a train traveling from Berlin to Frankfurt and you will find a quick connection in nearly every second-class compartment. But I have no desire to slander. Nevertheless, the corrosion has set in. Every woman who has lost her memory for the experiences of her lower body—and this is the second, deeper feature—has fallen victim to the sexual corruption. Once the internal unity between psychic and sexual experience was broken, once the isolation of sexual experience became the norm, Berlin arrived at a Hellenism of its own. It celebrates its festivals in the dark rooms adjoining every dance hall.

<http://www.weimarberlin.com/2018/03/prostitution-in-berlin.html>

Who was supplying children to this market? Who were these celebrities and international businessmen ordering children like pizza? Why were pharmacists involved? These were all questions of the day, and they remain remarkably familiar, today.

Other than to condemn these acts as the worst evil imaginable, I can find no justification for such crimes. Whoever these people were, they were sick and needed to be exterminated.

The rage that was building within average Germans would one day be harnessed by yet another creation of Ludendorff, Adolph Hitler.

Summary:

We have said previously that Germany was being thrown to wolves, following the successful infiltration and transition of power to Washington. This transition would commence in 1917. Let's review what actually happened:

Germany suffered a humiliating military defeat.

The imposition of the Versailles Treaty would send the nation broke.

The Reichswehr created a shadow intelligence operation, carried out domestically.

The Government knew about the shadow government, but allowed and enabled it.

Political and racial violence was fomented in the streets.

Class warfare was running rampant.

The new Republic was run by the far left, resulting in gross economic mismanagement.

The government paid workers to stay at home, rather than go to work.

This led to a government made energy crisis, and eventually hyperinflation.

Cartels had taken control of supply chains. (to be unpacked in Part V)

Fascists and Communists were rioting and overthrowing local government.

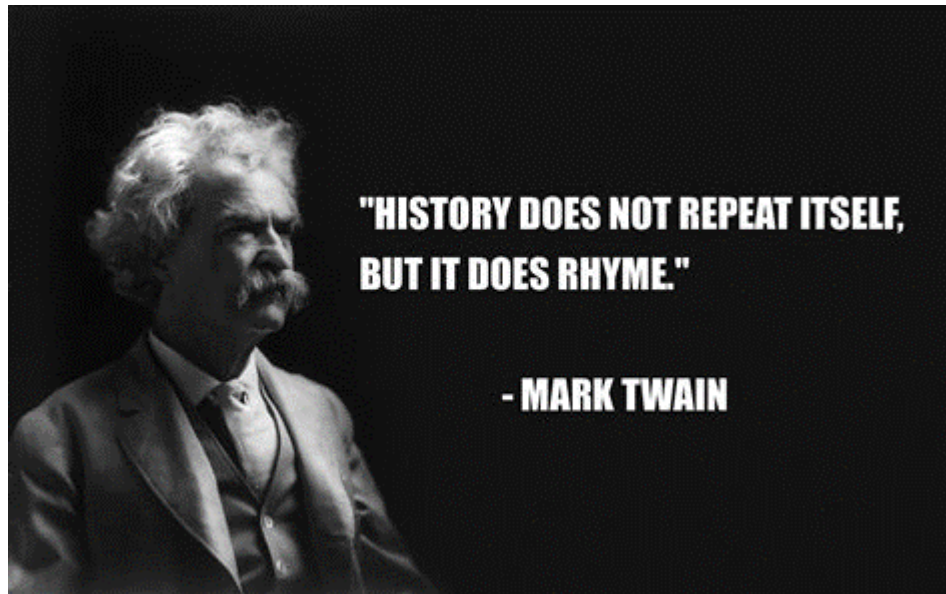

Political violence at the hand of the Black Reichswehr was being ignored by the courts.

Hyperinflation meant that wages fell below the cost of living.

A hyper-progressive culture emerged, led by the LGBT community.

Sexual debauchery had exploded.

Pharmacists were trafficking children for sex to the rich and famous.
