Part 1 of this series exposed the broader extent of the CIA's MKULTRA projects. We closed out Part 1 by showing that Dr Fauci was still gleefully learning from "bio-weaponers" and defectors from foreign nations in 2002. This article will explore whether projects like MKCHICKWIT and MKULTRA may have been covertly expanded, and whether similar research could still be taking place today.

Operation Outsource:

History is revealing that it became common-place for the CIA to outsource these experiments to private contractors. Whether it was to avoid those pesky FIOA requests, or to create a veil of secrecy, it is hard to be sure. It may even be both. Whatever their intent, this strategy created a separation between the origin of the funds and the contractor doing the work.

In these early days, having the CIA sponsor research laboratories via the Army and Navy was enough to avoid public scrutiny. This strategy worked a treat, as internet research was not yet a thing, and the public had not yet become proficient in learning how to "follow the money".

One of the earliest examples of corporate outsourcing was Edgewood Arsenal Research Laboratories:

II. Army Programs

It appears from the available documents that the Army was involved in one aspect of the Central Intelligence Agency project designated as MKCHICKWIT and two aspects of a counterpart project designated as MKOFTEN. The document search is described in section A below, and each of the Army programs is described in section B below.

B. Programs identified

(1) Identification of new drugs with behavioral effects

This project began in 1967 and was terminated in 1973. It was carried out primarily by a contractor in California. The project was apparently funded jointly by the Army, through Edgewood Arsenal Research Laboratories, and the Central Intelligence Agency. The funds contributed by the Agency were used by Edgewood for payments to a private contractor. This project was a part of the project designated as MKCHICKWIT.

It appears from the available documents that Edgewood had been testing a number of incapacitating agents in its own programs without Central Intelligence Agency participation. Edgewood identified a compound designated as EA#3167 as particularly effective and tested it on animals. Edgewood also engaged in clinical testing on human volunteers at the Holmesburg State Prison in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, using prisoners as test subjects and at the Edgewood laboratories using military personnel as test subjects. It appears that all of the test subjects were volunteers and that stringent medical safeguards and followup procedures were used.

In 1971, the Central Intelligence Agency reviewed prior Edgewood work and identified EA#3167 as relevant to the MKOFTEN program. The Agency set up a joint effort with Edgewood to pursue further testing of this compound. In 1971, the Agency transferred to Edgewood $37,000 for this purpose. Most of the testing under CIA sponsorship was with animals. The primary effort was to determine whether EA#3167 could be used effectively if applied to the skin through some type of adhesive tape. There was only one experiment that involved human subjects. In June, 1973, two military volunteers were apparently tested using EA#3167. The documents do not give any details with respect to these tests.

This deception was more subtle than just outsourcing research to private contractors. The involvement of the Army and Navy as a conduit of funds, added an additional layer to hide who was really running these projects:

III. Navy Programs

It appears from the available documents that the Navy was not involved in any aspect of the Central Intelligence Agency projects designated MKSEARCH and MKCHICKWIT. It appears that the Navy did act as a financial intermediary through which the Central Intelligence Agency dealt with an outside contractor that conducted one research effort that was a part of the MKOFTEN project. It also appears that the Navy conducted, directly or through contractors, five programs in which there was Central Intelligence Agency sponsorship or participation and which included the administration of drugs to human subjects for mind-control or behavior-modification purposes. The records that were searched are described in section A below. Each of the projects discovered is described in section B below.

B. Programs identified

(1) Synthesis of analogs of certain central nervous system stimulants

This project began in 1971 and was terminated in January, 1973. It was performed by a contractor located in Massachusetts. The involvement of the Navy was only as a conduit for funds between the contractor and the Central Intelligence Agency. Some of the funding documents identify this project as a part of project OFTEN.

The Central Intelligence Agency may have transmitted as much as $117,938 for this project to the Office of Naval Research during the period February 26, 1971 through June 23, 1972. The Central Intelligence Agency authorization document stated: "This project is funded through the Office of Naval Research. This arrangement protects the Agency's association with this area of research and provides the contractor with credible sponsorship. The work will be unclassified, but Agency association will be confidential." (Doc. No. CIA-1, 3.)

Details in this report we are highlighting go on to reveal that the projects carried out between 1947 and 1973 looked at central nervous system stimulants, a non-addictive substitute for codeine, effects of blast concussion, impact of LSD on human subjects, and the development and administration of speech-inducing drugs.

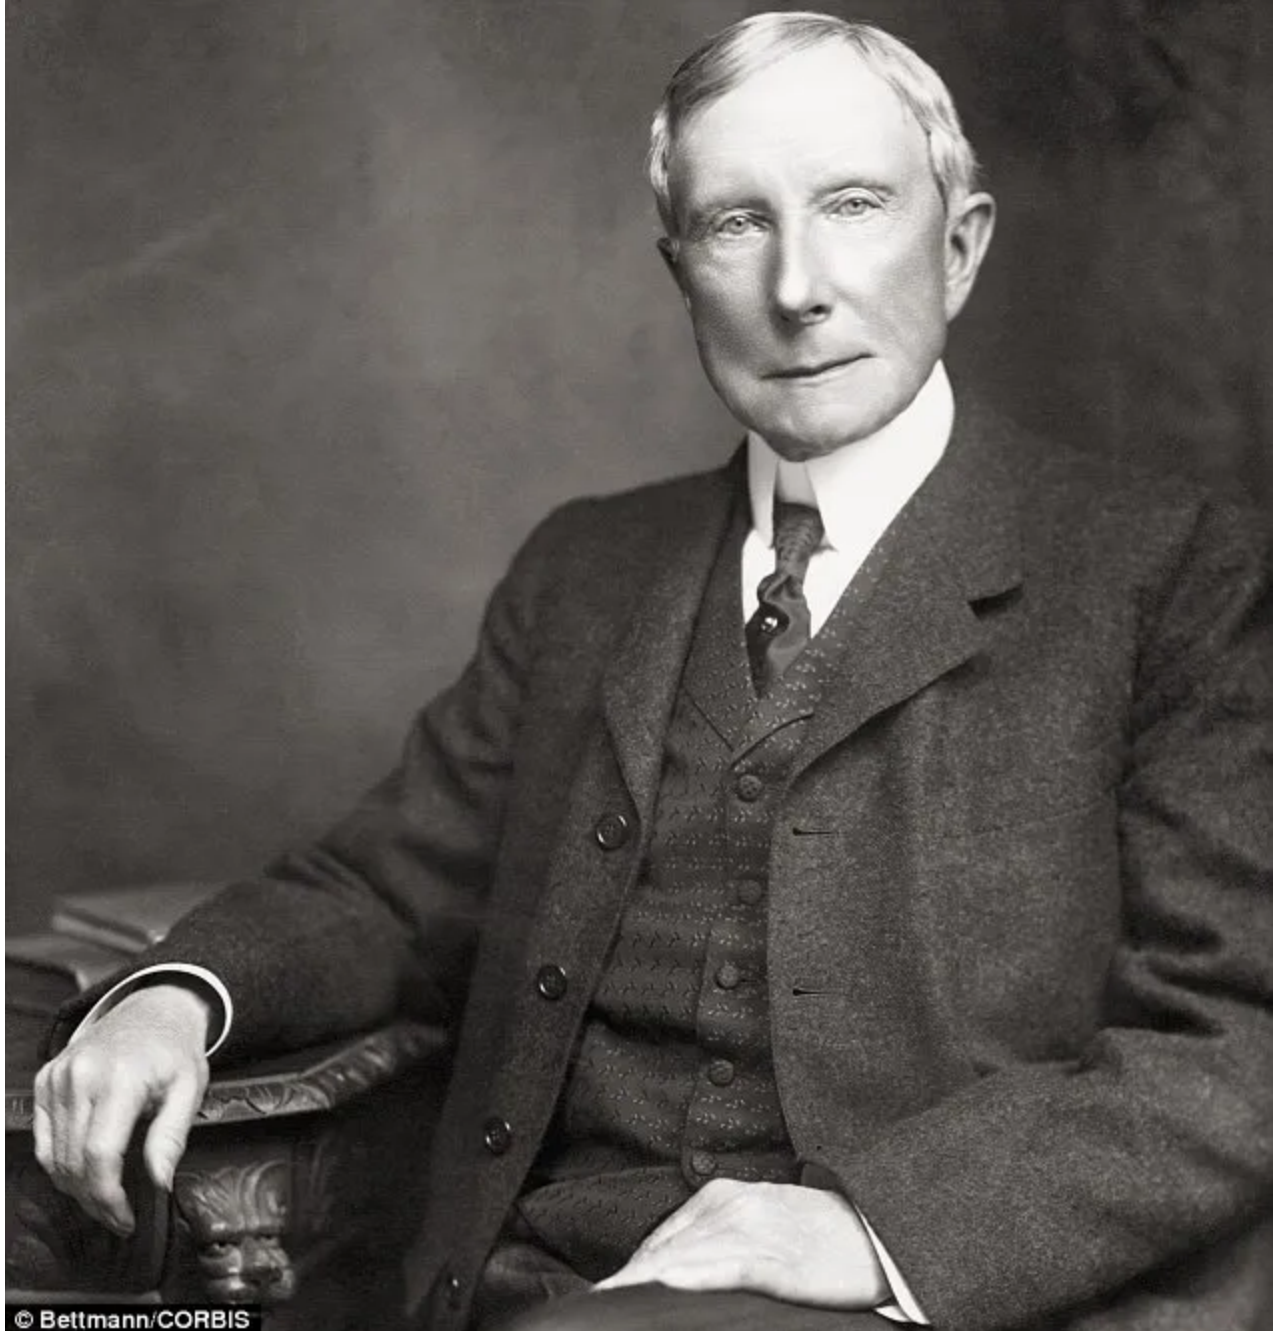

It went on to note that most of these projects were "officially" closed, but they were quietly rolled into several MKULTRA sub-programs. Here is just one example:

(4) Administration of LSD to human subjects

This project began in 1952 and was apparently completed by 1956. It was performed by a researcher located in New York. Navy is listed as a sponsor in only one CIA document prepared at a later date, and not otherwise corroborated. If Navy was involved, it was solely as a conduit for funds between the Central Intelligence Agency and the researcher. This project has been identified as subprojects 7, 27 and 40 of the MKULTRA project.

Who are these people? Is it possible that they consider themselves to be above humanity?

In our series “Council of the gods” we showed that the large corporate power-brokers in the US were connected to the IG Farben cartel. Understanding the connection that these large corporations had to Farben’s rubber, synthetics, chemicals and drug research, means it is highly likely that these corporate power-brokers were well-aware of the numerous MKULTRA research projects that the CIA were running.

#PrussiaGate articles have consistently asserted that this invisible enemy operates much like a self-appointed ruling monarch. While the absolute truth of such an assertion is difficult to substantiate, this CIA document offers a glimpse as to how these unelected global despots described themselves:

Included in the financial empire of the "oil kings," besides the Chase Manhattan Bank, are also the insurance companies Metropolitan Life Insurance and Equitable Life Insurance. The operations of these companies are extremely varied -- from the renting of railroad cars, to machinations ruining farmers of the South who have been obliged to mortgage their lands.

The Rockefellers make profit also on the daily needs of Americans. If an American smokes a cigarette, buys a sandwich or a package of meat, or drinks a glass of Coca-Cola, he increases the wealth of the "oil king" of America. Many other trusts and concerns in the USA are linked to the throne of the "oil king" with a dollar chain. They all serve one and the same goal of the uncrowned autocrats of America -- unrestrained profit through the exploitation, robbery, and deceit of the workers.

How did the dynasty of the "oil kings" arise? What does it represent? Where did its infinite wealth come from? Why does it -- together with a little group of other oligarchs of Wall Street -- rule America, and propel the affairs of the capitalist world?

The founder of the dynasty, John Davison Rockefeller I, at one time a government clerk, and later a cashier in a private firm, always -- according to his own admission -- thirsted "to make money." Much later when the income of this oil magnate exceeded the fortune of the English royal family, he said to reporters, "I believe that the capacity to make money is a gift from above, like a capability in art, music, or literature... Being gifted with this capacity, I consider it my duty to make more and more money..."

Source: CIA CREST Database 6

There are a few notable ‘take-aways’ in the above text:

- JD Rockefeller was noted as the “founder of the dynasty”.
- The CIA went on to refer to these oligarchs as “kings”, and noted that the “oil king” had his own “throne”.
- Other trusts and concerns were linked to the throne with “a dollar chain”.
- The “oil kings”, along with a “little group of other oligarchs of Wall Street” are suggested to “rule” America and “propel the affairs of the capitalist world”.

Do these people truly believe that they are our hereditary rulers?

Whoever they were, they shared the same goal of “the uncrowned autocrats of America”, which was to receive “unrestrained profit through the exploitation, robbery, and deceit of the workers.”

Had deceiving entire nations become a part of the modus operandi of these self-appointed despots?

Whatever their intentions, the horrific human experiments that took place at the ‘Edgewood Arsenal Research Laboratories’ are some of the earliest examples revealing the corporate partnerships taking place under the careful watch of US intelligence agencies.

Did ‘outsourcing’ operations hide the fact that these despots within government were supporting these experiments?

Without a doubt, this outsourcing strategy did achieve a level of secrecy, via contract separation. This allowed the CIA to control the flow of intelligence around these research operations, via their ‘responsibility’ to legally protect private contractors, including any emerging intellectual property (IP) that their research might create. In this way, outsourcing operations gave the CIA control over the public narrative, and removed those annoying expectations that people tend to have in relation to government transparency and accountability. It was quite brilliant really.

Once the public offered its tacit approval to such covert behavior, intelligence agencies could control the narrative around everything. This is one of the primary ways this enemy remains invisible. If elected officials and the media fail to hold them accountable, they can essentially do whatever they want.

Edgewood Arsenal provided the perfect cover for these CIA – Army operations, which we now learn involved the storage and weaponization of chemical and biological weapons:

Primary Agency interest seemed to relate to the development of dissemination equipment to be used with a standard set of agents kept on the shelf. A number of such dissemination devices appear to be peculiarly suited for the type of clandestine use one might associate with Agency operations. Some of these were included among hardware stored for the Agency at Edgewood Arsenal subsequent to the closure of SOD: attache cases rigged to disseminate an agent into the air, a cigarette case rigged to disseminate an agent when lighted, a fountain pen dart launcher, an engine head bolt designed to release an agent when heated, a fluorescent light starter to activate the light and then release an agent, etc. Available records do not indicate whether or not all these were developed specifically for the CIA, though the DOD investigation has identified the head bolt device as falling into such a category.

Z

This reads like something straight out of a James Bond film!

At the time, the CIA denied that these projects were happening, but with the benefit of decades of hindsight, and these declassified reports, we can now paint the true picture of what was taking place. The above file reveals that private corporations held equipment long after these projects were ‘officially’ shut down. How much of all this research was not revealed?

Why was there a consistent absence of good record-keeping? If these technologies were not being developed for the CIA, who were they being developed for? Is it possible that such research is still happening today?

One thing we do know is that during the Covid-19 fiasco, it was revealed that the Pentagon was funding research on viruses, which included gain-of-function research in China. This series will continue to try to answer the above questions, as we continue our research.

The experiments carried out at Edgewood upon US Veterans were disgusting, and we honor them accordingly. For those interested in knowing more detail about Edgewood's experiments, and viewing personal testimonies, this short clip provides a good summary (06:11 minutes):

The rise of big Pharma:

We showed in our series “Havens, Horse Heads and Hermann” the role that the Euro-bond market played in unleashing numerous globalist corporations and international ‘think tanks’ upon an unwitting public. “Officially” decoupling the US dollar from the gold standard in 1971 removed the leash entirely.

Whether it was intended or not, one consequence of this new ‘global’ dollar, was the creation of partnerships between private corporations and scientific research institutes. What emerged was a network of massive multi-national corporations and NGOs, all with seemingly unlimited access to government funding. Was this the point in history when the rise of ‘big pharma’ was put into warp-speed?

If we go back just a few decades to the Nuremberg Trials, we learned that IG Farben's research into chemicals and rubber, synthetics and chemicals was of great interest to the US Government. Our “Council of the gods” series showed that it was of such interest, that the research-potential was captured by the US government and brought onto US soil. This expertise had the potential to morph seamlessly into what we know today as Big Pharma and the Military Industrial Complex. We have already demonstrated that after the arrival of Nazi scientists, the CIA programs expanded into chemical research which was then merged with covert mind control experiments.

This somewhat-shocking detail invites a more sobering question: Could the government's MKULTRA research be responsible for launching the vast industry of behavior-modifying drugs and anti-depressants that we are faced with today?

To explore this possibility, we start by observing that the US were leading the way in antidepressant research, along with Germany, France and Switzerland, at about the same time. Also recall, in Urania – Part 5 we showed how the combination of hypno-sissyporn, ketamine and BDSM was used by Ilsa Strix in the transition of Larry Wachowski. ⁸

To properly interrogate whether the government's MKULTRA research might be responsible, we would need to find a connection between Ilsa's drug of choice, ketamine, and the evolution of modern antidepressants:

Methods

Thus, in this paper, we present a historical review of the development of monoaminergic antidepressant drugs and the role of ketamine as the introductory agent of a new era in the research of the neurobiology of depression.

Results

Firstly, we review how the pharmacological treatment for major depression started, and we point out the main drugs discovered, the researchers involved, and how the studies developed have contributed to the understanding of the neurobiology of depression. Secondly, the major problems regarding the clinical efficacy and acceptance of these drugs are discussed, and the introduction of the glutamatergic system as a target for antidepressant drugs is presented. Finally, we review how ketamine revealed itself as an exciting option towards obtaining pharmacological agents to treat depression, through the understanding of biological markers.

10

This connection is almost a smoking gun, and provides an obvious link to ketamine. However, before we jump to conclusions, we need more evidence to link it all to government research. Let's start by reviewing the scope of the CIA-sponsored programs:

GENERAL COUNSEL OF THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE
WASHINGTON, D. C. 20301

September 20, 1977

MEMORANDUM FOR THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

SUBJECT: Experimentation Programs Conducted by the Department of Defense That Had CIA Sponsorship or Participation and That Involved the Administration to Human Subjects of Drugs Intended for Mind-control or Behavior-modification Purposes

Source: CIA CREST Database 11

The subject matter of these programs was certainly not ambiguous – “mind control” and “behavior modification” upon “human subjects”!

Earlier screen shots from the above file revealed that these MKULTRA programs were carried out between 1947 and 1973. This latest document also reveals that many of the human trials were conducted on prisoners. Prisoner experimentation offers another very unique detail which would help demonstrate that they were probably CIA-sponsored programs.

An examination of the history of ketamine’s rise as a drug, also provided evidence around who the subjects of these experiments were:

Ketamine: turning tables on antidepressant research

The history of ketamine

In 1956, an anaesthetic compound called phencyclidine was synthesised at Parke, Davis & Co. laboratories in Detroit, MI, USA (52). Animal studies showed that this drug had remarkable anaesthetic effects and could cause behavioural alterations. Thus, after toxicity studies, it was approved for use in humans (53). However, clinical studies showed that phencyclidine was not ideal for human anaesthesia since it might cause long-lasting emergence delirium and lead to something similar to a schizophrenic syndrome (54). Given that this drug had interesting anaesthetic effects, Parke, Davis & Co. decided to search for a phencyclidine derivative with a shorter period of action to avoid the long-lasting behavioural side effects (53). One of the synthesised compounds, CI-581, successfully underwent pre-clinical studies and was approved for human studies, which led to Parke, Davis & Co. contacting Dr. Edward F. Domino to lead such clinical studies. In 1964, the first human experiment with CI-581, later named as ketamine, was conducted on prisoners from the Jackson Prison, Michigan, USA. The studies conducted by Dr. Domino produced notable results accompanied by fewer side effects (53). However, the behavioural side effects of ketamine were still considerable and in order to get the FDA approval for clinical use, they decided to call it a 'dissociative anaesthetic', which proved to be a successful measure.

12

Are we reading this correctly? To get ketamine approved by the FDA they called it a “dissociative anaesthetic”? Did someone just make this shit up?

Well, as it turns out, that’s exactly what happened! Dr. Edward Domino, who was leading these Park-Davis studies, spoke to his lovely wife Toni about the research he was doing:

the three researchers were about to coin the term ‘dreaming’ to describe the peculiar anaesthetic state, when fortunately, as Domino spoke to his wife Toni of the fact that patients seemed to be ‘disconnected’, she suggested the term ‘dissociative anaesthetic.’¹ So was ketamine finally characterised.¹¹

“Dissociative anaesthetics” magically became an entirely new category of drug, meaning ketamine was now classified as a central nervous system therapeutic. Given its profoundly devastating effect on the human body, this categorization was quite reasonable, albeit chilling. However, here is the clincher: This new categorization allowed Parke, Davis and Co. to obtain FDA approval for the clinical use of ketamine upon the broader populace. We sincerely wish that what we are revealing here is a joke; but it is true.

The other smoking gun in this story, is that Parke, Davis and Co. had access to prisoners in Jackson Prison in Michigan. The ability to access the prison system for trial subjects almost-certainly confirms some level of government involvement in their ketamine research. Can any of us just wander into a prison and run some random tests on the inmates?

A reasonable amount of evidence exists to suggest that Parke, Davis and Co. was probably one of the private contractors being sponsored by the CIA at this time.

Further confirming this likelihood, their status in the industry was highly-regarded. Parke, Davis and Co. was the industrial leader in the development of pharmacological research in the United States. In 1902 Parke-Davis built the first industrial laboratory on the shores of the Detroit River, devoted exclusively to pharmacological research.

14

All of this evidence begins to answer our original question which was whether the government's MKULTRA programs were responsible for the vast new industry of behavior-modifying drugs and anti-depressants that humanity is faced with today.

While the historical evidence screams a resounding "yes", this invites another far more-chilling question: Is humanity currently involved in a war for its mind?

Researchers also found that twice as many white people take those drugs as do other minorities.

15

This trend in the uptake of anti-depressants was not confined to the US. It appears that Australia, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and Canada were not immune from this attack either:

Australians are taking antidepressants in record numbers and for longer than ever, but coming off them can be ‘frightening’

Matthew Perry's eerie ketamine revelations in 2022 memoir

Matthew Perry wrote vividly about his experiences with ketamine, the drug that would go on to kill him, in his 2022 tell-all memoir.

Matthew Perry wrote about the drug that contributed to his death.

Hours after an autopsy report revealed the actor suddenly died in October from the “acute effects of ketamine,” a portion of his 2022 memoir in which he spoke about his dislike of the anaesthetic has resurfaced.

Perry, who died at the age of 54, revealed in Friends, Lovers, and the Big Terrible Thing: A Memoir, that he received ketamine infusions while in a Swiss rehab clinic during the pandemic.

“Ketamine was a very popular street drug in the 1980s. There is a synthetic form of it now, and it’s used for two reasons: to ease pain and help with depression,” he explained.

Depressed or controlled?

The recent rise in the use of these drugs is quite literally, unbelievable. How did antidepressants suddenly become trendy? Was this an organic shift in the free market, with the drug industry simply meeting demand, or was the collective mind of humanity having anti-depressants pushed upon it?

While some beneficial advancements undoubtedly emerged from these MKULTRA programs, such as anesthetics, the research was part of a quest to learn how to control people’s minds, and alter people’s behavior. The sinister forces behind these operations don’t simply disappear, just because time advances. Even today, our governments do not appear interested in asking these awkward questions, or answering them, for that matter! Answers will only emerge once the people demand transparency.

We would suggest that we must start asking these questions, and withdrawing our tacit consent to the never-ending mandates of these maniacal, self-appointed Enlightened Despots. If ‘we the people’ don’t stand up, they will destroy humanity.

Today, we know this anti-depressant or synthetic-medicine industry as the Pharmaceutical Industry, which derives its name from an old Greek word, with an extremely interesting meaning:

Pharmacy is derived from the Greek word pharmakeia, meaning "use of drugs, medicines, potions, or spells; poisoning, witchcraft; remedy, cure."

Our story will now take a brief detour, as we explore the history of the rise of this self-appointed scientific community that seems intent on influencing, at the very least, and possibly controlling the collective mind of entire nations.

In centuries past, the apothecary's study of herbal and chemical ingredients was a precursor to the modern sciences of chemistry and pharmacology; it was a very ancient practice. We showed the role of the apothecaries and the philosophers during the Age of Enlightenment, in our article - 'An Ode to a Prussian Pickle – Part 8'. The Age of Enlightenment had been threatening for a couple of centuries, but really kicked into gear in the 1700s.

The Age of Enlightenment was a period of individual exploration in all fields. It was all about the pursuit of individual freedom and happiness. New possibilities were being explored, and natural healing techniques were being discovered that would improve the lives of the people. Such exploration posed a threat to the old order, who wanted to remain in control.

One of these medical breakthroughs was found in the work of Samuel Hahnemann. Samuel was a German physician, and founder of the system of therapeutics known as homeopathy.

His work obviously had an enormous impact on the apothecaries of the day, along with others involved in plant-based activation of the immune system. Despite being Prussian, we do not cast any aspersions upon Hahnemann's character, or the genius of his discoveries. However, his methods did attract our attention. Why? Because his genius was uncovered by experimenting on the healthy, not the sick:

Hahnemann studied medicine at Leipzig and Vienna, taking the degree of M.D. at Erlangen in 1779... and then moved to Leipzig in 1789. In the following year, while translating William Cullen's Lectures on the Materia medica into German, he was struck by the fact that the symptoms produced by quinine on the healthy body were similar to those of the disordered states that quinine was used to cure. This observation led him to assert the theory that "likes are cured by likes,"... diseases are cured (or should be treated) by those drugs that produce in healthy persons symptoms similar to the diseases. He promulgated his principle in a paper published in 1796...

His chief work, Organon der rationellen Heilkunst (1810; "Organon of Rational Medicine"), contains an exposition of his system, which he called Homöopathie, or homeopathy. His Reine Arzneimittellehre, 6 vol. (1811; "Pure Pharmacology"), detailed the symptoms produced by "proving" a large number of drugs—i.e., by systematically administering them to healthy subjects.

In 1821 the hostility of apothecaries forced him to leave Leipzig... 23

To be fair, experimenting on the healthy, in symptomatic terms only, is a far cry from torture, mind control, lobotomy, castration and death, which were the results of the government-sanctioned experiments that would take place in later years. Is it possible that Hahnemann's genius attracted the attention of those with despotic tendencies? Let's explore if, and how, this may have occurred.

The quote above noted that Hahnemann was translating work by William Cullen, who was a significant leader in the Scottish Enlightenment. Cullen was a physician, chemist and an agriculturist. He went on to become the first Physician to the King in Scotland (1773–1790). His work is notable because Cullen defined disease "as an excess or deficiency of sensibility." However, Cullen interpreted sensibility as "muscle mobility and vigour" and suggested that diseases were caused by the imbalance of irritability and sensibility. Based on this definition of disease, his therapeutics "either stimulated or sedated the nervous system". 24

For anyone interested in Cullen's work, his 424-page treatise can be found here.

We focus on this obscure connection, because these two notable physicians began to explore merging the role of the physician with an understanding of plant-based medicines and the human nervous system. While the use of plant-based medicine was an ancient practice, the idea of administering these drugs to healthy people to map immune and nervous system responses appeared to be have been leading-edge at this time. The detail about the history of this practice is less important to us than the fact that this scientific method had gained traction in the Prussian empire at the exact time when eugenics and depopulation was also being discussed. The timing was notable.

Hahnemann's exit from Leipzig in 1821 suggests that his methods of micro-dosing natural tinctures to heal people may not have been welcomed by the Enlightened Despots during this period.

While it would be easy to focus only on Hahnemann's ability to heal using natural means, there was something else that may have attracted the attention of the 'old order' at this time. Hahnemann had revealed that micro-dosing plant-based tinctures could induce sickness in the healthy, and affect the nervous system.

Did the eugenicists of the day become aware of Hahnemann's and Cullen's connection with natural medicines and the immune-nervous system, and commence their own micro-dosing research?

The significance of Hahnemann's work was well known in the late 1800s, including its "sick-making powers". A notable quote by Constantine Hering in this 1884 article appears to suggest that Hahnemann's knowledge of homeopathy may even be under some sort of threat, just as he was back in 1821:

MATERIA MEDICA—A SCIENCE, ITS NATURE,
USES, AND HOW IT IS TO BE USED.

Materia medica is one of the sciences supposed to belong especially to the domain of practical medicine, and the knowledge of it to be of chief interest to those who have given their lives to the work of healing the sick. It embraces all the knowledge we have of the action of certain agents on the organism of man, changing the functions of its organs so that these, while under the power of these agents, are found in departure from that harmony of action we call health, the agents being thus declared to be sick-making substances. A knowledge of these substances, as belonging to the domain of materia medica, whenever obtained, discloses the fact that each agent disturbs this harmony in a manner peculiar to itself, in this differing from the action of all other sick-making powers.

Whatever the case, we can recall that homeopathy became heavily demonized in western nations, even being labelled as a dangerous “eastern medicine” and something that should be avoided. This belief existed throughout much of the 1900s, and was embraced by religious organizations, who essentially claimed it had dangerous spiritual origins, almost to a point that it might invite demons into the body. It was not until late in the 20th century, that there was a broader return to the acceptance of natural methods of healing within western nations.

The threat identified in the above Medical Science journal was real. This threat will have to be the subject of a future article. What we can observe however, is that it seems likely that Hahnemann's work was "Fredericked" by the Rockefellers and Johns Hopkins University which was founded in 1876, just before the above article. Daniel Coit Gilman was a founder and first President of Johns Hopkins. During his tenure at Yale, in 1856, Gilman was instrumental in incorporating Skull and Bones as the Russell Trust Association, which was the society's legal operating entity. The founder of Skull and Bones, William H. Russell, was named president and Gilman became the treasurer. Gilman was pivotal in bringing the "old world" of Prussia to the United States:

What were his influences as an academic reformer?

After graduating from Yale, he went to Europe for almost three years and had a chance to go and investigate all the great universities of the "Old World." He spent a lot of time in Germany, France, and England. If you wanted to get a PhD in the 1840s and 1850s, you went to Germany. And if you wanted to study medicine, you went to Germany. It's an immutable fact that in terms of graduate education, Germany was far ahead of the United States. And so Gilman recognized the German model of emphasis on primary research, and then the British emphasis on the seminar method, with full-time faculty serving in so many ways as mentors. And then he had the idea of melding the two, which had never ever been tried before.

26

Gilman's vision was outlined in his inaugural speech as the first President of Johns Hopkins on 22 February 1876:

An enduring foundation; a slow development, first local, then regional, then national influence; the liberal promotion of all useful knowledge; the special provision of departments as are elsewhere neglected in this country; a generous affiliation with all other institutions, avoiding interferences and engaging in no rivalry; the encouragement of research; the promotion of young men; and the advancement of individual scholars, who by their excellence will advance the sciences they pursue, and the society where they dwell.

Johns Hopkins developed a new way of classifying medicine, which effectively destroyed homeopathy, whose cures were natural, making them unpatentable and not profitable. In a sense, Johns Hopkins University did to medicine what Frederick the Great did to the Age of Enlightenment; it seized control, ensuring that the public narrative could be “managed” appropriately.

The establishment of Johns Hopkins, and its influence, would change the face of science and medicine. It was almost like the entire western world had been placed under a spell; the spell of “modern medicine”. Incredibly, ancient religious text even records the possibility of such a rise in the presence of pharmacists within society:

For your merchants were the great ones of the earth; because by your sorcery (pharmakeia) all the nations were deceived.

Revelation 18:23b - Berean Literal Bible. 28

Let’s quickly revisit the meaning of this word:

Strong's Concordance

5331 pharmakeía (from pharmakeuō, "administer drugs") – properly, drug-related sorcery, like the practice of magical-arts, etc. (A. T. Robertson).

Applying just a little bit of poetic license, the above bible reference seems to suggest that at some point in the future, a mighty force of merchant-traders (referred to as ‘Babylon’) would connect with a significant Pharmaceutical Industrial Complex, which would deceive all nations on earth.

In Evolution of Slavery – Part 1, we showed how the Hanseatic League merchants joined with the Bank of England under William of Orange, essentially beginning the modern expression of global banking. Within this context, it is extremely interesting that the word “merchants” was used in the bible text alongside a reference to sorcery, or pharmakeia.

Is it possible that the spirit of this old network of merchants still lives on, now partnering with scientists and philosophers to create a series of connected Industrial Complexes, at such a scale that it could deceive all nations on earth?

Really, what we are exploring is whether it is possible that the creative human-spark expressing through humanity during the Age of Enlightenment could have been hijacked by a group of despots. It is not easy to work out how to begin to answer such a question. However, if we live in a world where anyone who questions institutional religious doctrine are labelled heretics, anyone who questions the medical industry are labelled quacks, and anyone who questions socio-economic norms are labelled hippies, then we may have our answer!

As most readers know, we do not research history for the sake of understanding history; we look to history to identify the invisible controlling force that has suppressed human freedom for centuries, and maybe even longer. We aim to identify patterns of the past which are useful in informing the choices we make today.

To understand if humanity is being subjected to some sort of spell or an elaborate system of control, we must look for consistent patterns. These are the types of questions worth asking:

- Is there an almost-invisible ‘force’ seeking to force our behavior?
- Is free and expansive thought being encouraged or discouraged?
- Do television shows and influencers push certain ideologies – almost as if they are coordinating in the background?
- Do our governments censor speech?

- Do our governments remove certain privileges to coerce compliant behavior?
- Are we consistently told that all laws and mandates are for the health and safety of everyone?
- Is there a realm of international organizations, who leaders are appointed, not elected, seeking to control member nations via forced agreements to their own mandates?

Many are now exploring these types of questions. Many are also exploring the nature of freedom, and questioning whether this is what it should look like.

Having taken this brief detour, let's come back to the topic at hand. What we do know is that these CIA experiments had a massive influence upon modern medicine. The resulting Pharmaceutical-Industrial Complex has played an enormous role in shaping our human experience. For many, the need for prescription medication is the most important factor in their life; requiring attention from the moment they wake up each morning. For others, antidepressants may even preserve their life. Whatever the case, this is where humanity finds itself!

At some point, humanity will decide whether this burgeoning Pharmaceutical-Industrial Complex influences our next 50 years, in the same way it has influenced our last 50 years.

In a slightly-amusing diversion relating to mind-control research, a 1975 CIA report to the Department of Defense reported on US companies operating in Portugal, and our friends at Parke, Davis and Co. got a mention... in a very interesting category:

Following is a list of US-owned or partly US-owned firms that were operating in Portugal in 1971 and are believed to be still active:

NAME OF PARENT AMERICAN CORPORATION	NAME AND FUNCTION OF CORPORATION OPERATING IN PORTUGAL
Parke, Davis, & Co.	Parke, Davis, & Co. (Servicos de Informacoes e Propaganda) Sales promotion office

30

Propaganda is all about deception and illusion. Widespread government outsourcing of research means that these massive pharmaceutical corporations operate under a veil of secrecy; essentially being afforded the same benefits given to intelligence agencies. These covert research programs were accepted by the public, as they generally believed they were promoting health, economic prosperity and wartime protection.

Was this strategy designed to convince us that a big, powerful government is essential for our safety and well-being?

Whatever the case, there were always going to be consequences if these types of partnerships continued, unchecked. Today, the world is confronted by a massive corporate industrial-war machine, which most of us know nothing about:

U.S. defense contractors

 BAE Systems	 Raytheon	 Oshkosh Corporation
 L3Harris Technologies	 Leidos	 KBR
 Honeywell	 CACI International	 Raytheon Technologies
 Booz Allen Hamilton	 Leonardo	 DynCorp International LLC

Looking at one example; in 2020 Lockheed Martin received \$58.2 billion from Defense, which represented 89% of its total revenue. In 2022, they received \$45.7 billion, which represented 11.05% of the government’s total Defense expenditure. The “council of the gods” would be proud!

In addition to their unchecked ability to surveil nations, defense contractors now appear free to charge the US taxpayers whatever they want (0:27 seconds):

Price Gouging | Sunday on 60 Minutes

A longer clip from the 2023 60 Minutes report into US Defense Contractors can be found here for those interested in watching (13:24 mins).

The power issued to these monopolistic defense contractors by governments is incredible, and this doesn't even include the numerous other contractors who essentially serve as our global intelligence agency. This second list includes Hakluyt, who we featured heavily in our series, “An Ode to the Prussian Pickle”, as well as Fusion GPS, who is well known for its involvement in the Trump – Russia collusion hoax.

While we want to believe these organizations are trustworthy and upholding the people's Constitution, history is revealing that these organizations have not always operated in the interests of the people's right to pursue their own freedom.

Did the outsourcing of bio-weapon's research create a far bigger beast that may never be tamed? Appearing to grow at the same rate as the Eurodollar and international economy, were these global corporations doing the bidding for We the People, or are they acting for someone else?

Thanks, Will. However, I hope we can explore the fraud that is virology and the associated fear propaganda. Viruses have never been proven to exist, same with bio weapons. What really makes people "sick" is fear and the associated mind control.
